CALVIN W. PRICE, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1923

A case of very considerable interest in a live stock country was the trial of Divers Sharp of the Williams River country on the charge of stealing sheep. This is one of the grievous crimes known to common law. Sheep are highly important in the scheme of mountain life. They are highly prolific and hardy and valuable. Or they are barren and worthless, and die like sheep as the saying is. The dogs worry them and destroy them and discourage the industry, and to the uneducated eye one sheep looks much like another and they are easily lost or mislaid. They pay dividends twice a year, in the spring when the wool crop comes in and in the fall when the lambs go upon the market. And they are subject to loss through theft on the two occasions. In the spring the removing of the fleece changes the tout ensemble so effectively that the owner might pass the sheep in the big road and not know it, and in the fall the roads are thronged with close packed droves and a stray sheep is as a needle in a haystack. Sheep in the range along the road will even insist on joining a drove and going to the shambles with them, and the honest drover is put to much trouble and pains to keep stray sheep out of the drifting mass.

Then to every man and drover comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Right and Wrongful,
for the good or evil side,
When some fat and fickle wether
jumps stiff legged in the road,
And insists on being numbered with the sheep of his car load;
Then he puts the devil from him, and with many a curse and shout,
He works, and frets, and fiddles till he cuts the stranger out.

The wool crop of the county has brought in as much as a quarter of million of dollars in a single year and the income from lambs is generally much larger than the clip. If obstacles like dogs and sheep stealers and a few other draw backs could be eliminated the financial troubles of this county would be solved for it is quite possible for the sheep industry to be four times what it is now. There is an art in raising sheep that has been well acquired and this is a healthy county for sheep, but there is every reason why sheep should not be the sole source of income when the perils of the business are so great.

The way to identify sheep is to get to know them by their faces just as people are distinguished. And the ability to know sheep is what marks the successful shepherd.

Last spring the question of sheep stealing had become so acute that a number of farmers made up a reward for conviction of sheep thieves and that part of the county seems to have got through the season better. The unknown were communicated with through the newspaper and that is about the only way that you can get the word through to the underworld sometimes.

It was a sad case that was tried at the late term of the court. The defendant was a man owning a small farm; he was heavily in debt; he was a hard worker; he had a wife and eight children. There was never a day too cold and rough but what he might be seen with wagon and team bringing loads of lumber into town, and starting for home ten miles up a mountain about dark.

The sheep that got him into trouble belonged to M. L. Beard and were thirteen of a flock of two hundred and twenty on Mr. Beard's Days Run property in the immediate neighborhood of the defendant's farm. Days Run is a beautiful little trout stream that enters Williams River just above the Meadows.

Some sheep having turned up missing, a systematic search was made on other lands in that vicinity. The Beard sheep were well marked with a horse shoe tar mark back of the shoulder, and one ear had been changed by cutting off the lower or "belly" of ear long ways. About the first of June, the main herd had not been sheared, but they came on one of the missing sheep on the lands of the defendant, and this sheep was sheared and the ear mark changed. It showed two notches above and two below on each ear, and that was the ear mark of the defendant. The search was then continued and directed towards the flock of the defendant and thirteen sheep were found and identified. The marking by notches was very recent, the wounds not having wholly healed. Learning where the wool of the defendant had been marketed at a Marlinton store the fleeces were found and in some cases it was apparent that a tar mark had been clipped off. The arrest trial and conviction followed. A second prosecution for another bunch of sheep, The Shearer sheep, followed and there were two felony indictments on the docket to be tried, and a verdict of guilty having been brought in, and it appearing that there was a chance for the the sentences to run concurrently, the defendant and his counsel made a virtue of a necessity, and plead guilty to the second indictment and the court sentenced the prisoner to two years in the pen in each case, but very mercifully allowed the sentences to run concurrently so it is possible that freedom may be restored to him in twenty months. It is going to be a hard time with this defendant. He is a lean man about forty years old and is no more inured to confinement than a wild deer. And the winds will howl over the Williams River mountain this winter and not find Divers in thin clothing driving his team along the fozen road.

A number of years ago a man was sent from this county to the pen for stealing sheep and it was related that in the course of his travels that mutton was set before him and he was moved to remark that he never liked mutton anyway.

It is hard on the defendant and his family but the way of the transgressor is hard, and there is no doubt that sheep owners generally rest easier on their pillows.

As to the rest of the men who think they have a right to be careless with other men's sheep, the only way open is to communicate with them is through the county press, but that in itself may not be sufficient to those who cannot read, so in addition to the power of the press we suggest that the pulpit and the school teachers try to spread the word, that the shepherds are up and no longer are they consenting parties to the lifting of sheep.

Every thing to him that waits. It has been a long time since a deer could be killed in these mountains legally and there is reason to believe that they have increased to a considerable extent. A open season has been proclaimed largely on account of the fact that a good many important men felt that if the time did not come soon that they would never have a chance to kill one more deer Men who remember when they could count on getting some deer every fall just as they counted on husking corn.

And it came to pass in those days, that as the time for butchering hogs drew nigh, the wife would say unto her husband: Day after tomorrow we kill hogs, and yet verily we have no venison to put in the sausage. Take ye then your gun and go across the creek and over the ridge to the salt log, and bring me the fat buck that uses there.

So early in the morning the goodman taketh down his gun and putteth a deer load therein and hastens forth while it is yet night and goes to the lick log and slays the deer and brings him in.

There is a constant stream of hunters filing by the desk of the county clerk these days to get a hunter's license for one dollar cash good during the calendar year. The clerk seems to be greatly burdened with this new department wished on him by an all wise legislature without any additional compensation. I do not know how it is in other counties, but in this county it is accepted with the greatest cheerfulness, for it gives Squire Brown an opportunity of meeting in person some thousands good men and true whom he would not otherwise see and get acquainted with. They write a short description of their personal appearance, giving age. complexion, height, weight, and color of their scalps, and pay over the dollar and go on their way rejoicing, for as the philosopher. Stevenson, I think, puts it: It is bet ter to travel hopefully than to arrive.

So it may be better to hunt hopefully then to kill. And I believe I can testify to that.

I sued my license out but have not used it yet, and I do not think that I shall. Or should I say "I do not think I will." "Shall" or "will," I never learned how to use them and never will. I believe I can make it plainer by saying that I will not go hunting of my own volition, unless I shall be obliged to defend myself from a deer running over me, and it has been many a weary year since that happened, and that only when I deliberately placed myself at some place where deer are accustomed to cross a stream, or go through a notch in a mountain.

They tried a man down south the other day for killing another man, and his defense was that the deceased had sent him word that the next time they met that he would shoot him. The trial judge instructed the jury that it was the duty of the prisoner when he got such word to have avoided meeting the threatener, which may not be law but which is good common sense. But the appellate court said that instruction did not properly propound the law for under that rule a man might not be able to go home, and the prisoner was given a new trial. So a man need not give ground to an infuriated deer, but it will be much wiser to do so, for it is hard to get such an excuse accepted.

There is one phase about this open season for deer that was not fully discounted, and that is that many and many a man has had a big buck marked down all summer, and that same buck is apt to be ambushed and shot as he goes to his bed in the grim gray dawn of the first day of the hunting season. Deer have certain places above the fly line in walking distance of some salting place and many of these deer are going to be destroyed this year. It is a vexed question. I think the local hunters are entitled to an open season. It is clearly a concession, but the law has been well observed, and about all the deer hunters worthy of the name are elderly men and entitled to some relief. They are going to find the mountains steeper and higher than they were before, and some of them may have to do like a famous old rifleman that I remember years ago, and put on four pairs of specs to draw a bead on the game, but the old boys have got another chance. Let them go to it.

I can remember the days of home spun clothes. And in those days it was the custom at many farm houses to throw the deer antlers on the roof of a shed fronting to the road, where the sight of them would drive a vising huntsman crazy to kill. But never no more. Deer horns are not so carelessly displayed of late years They are very important. It might occur that a doe was killed inadvertently and then a pair of horns would come in handy.

Or you might have a friend who shall come to you at midnight, and say unto you, Friend, lend me a pair of deer horns, for my oldest son has had the misfortune to kill a fat doe, and the game warden is in the neighborhood, and has got wind of the occurrence, and if he comes around tomorrow morning, I have no horns to set before him.

The game law is doing a lot of good and is being administerd wisely and considerately, but some of us do not need any game law to keep us good. The older I get the more I realize that such things as deers are more than a match for me, and that they are in no danger from my wobbling rifle or my heavy feet. A deer knows how to look out for his own skin.

I learned another bird. I have no doubt forgotten a bird in the meantime. I cannot say what bird it iifs have forgotten, for it is obvious II could tell you what bird it is I would not have forgotten it. Yes, I do know what the bird is that I forgot It is the grackle. A lady turned the conversation on me the other day and I missed out on grackle, but I bet I would know the corn-pulling son of a gun if I saw him again even I never knew him by that name.

The bird I learned is the nut-hatch I referred to it in a former article as a flicker. That is when the lamp of knowledge flickered and went out. It was no flicker, and I was inclined to let the record stand and if accused of ignorance I intended to plead not guilty and call for proof, but with the passing of the days, and a friendly nut-hatch almost eating out of my hand, I find it impossible to keep from talking about it, and if you do not want to hear about nut-hatches you had better stay away from our house.

I did not like him on his first appearance. There is more than one of them, but I the one I am intimate with is the head of the family, that is he is the old bird. Every heart knoweth its own bitterness, and the bird only knows as to whether he is treated with proper respect by Mrs Nut-hatch who is hanging around with him still.

I was putting out peanuts for the squirrels. I find that peanuts is a cheap and convenient food universally appreciated by wild animals One time a bunch of us tried to break into Biltmore by telling the lodge-keeper that we had come all the way from the north to feed peanuts to the swans. He was entertained by the conversation but did not let us in.

I soon found that this bird was watching for the peanuts and would beat the squirrels to them, and I would shoo him away and give the squirrels a chance. Then I found out that this bird with a brain that would weigh perhaps two grains had lots of sense and was even friendly with humans. I would put out the peanuts in the rough bark of a big walnut tree. The bird would take one out and carry it to a vice and clamp it in, and hack away at the shell until it got to the kernel and then it would eat it and then go and get another one. The crevices I selected did not hold the nut right for him, for he has a peculiar fashion of working, resting and reposing with his head down and his tail pointed straight to the zenith. He can run up a tree head foremost but the moment he is at ease he turns upside down and rests that way. Therefore he desired a crevice in the bark that held the nut so that he could work conveniently with his head pointed down. He has a long, sharp bill and has a black spot on his head, a blue coat marked with black, a white breast, and a patch of red down under a square tail, and is about six inches long.

The Bible says let your conversation be yea, yea. This bird literally adopts that injunction. Just at the break of dawn, I can hear him shouting ont yay-yay! The books give it that he says yank yank! followed by ya-ya! This one does not. He says yay-yay! That is his word. I first tried to make Cheer up! out of it and it is not hard to make that out of it, but I finally come to the conclusion that yay-yay, is what it is in the original sanscrit.

The bird has finally become more popular than the squirrels and he is welcome to the peanuts as long as they hold out. What I am wondering now is whether he will spend the winter with us but I look for him to make the southern tour.

About that name, nut hatch. It does not have anything to do with hatching eggs. It is hatch as used in the combination hatchet. It means that he uses his bill as a hatchet, to hack, or as the artists say to hatch with. They used to work flax with a toothed instrument called a hatchel. The bird's name is clearly derived from its treatment of nuts, and if it was called the nut hack, it would be plainer now, though when it was named, hatch was the common form of hack.

You are queer, Mister Nuthatch, the young man said,
But your nerves are wonderful, steady;
You seem to contsnually stand on your head,
Does it make you not giddy and heady?
Yay, yay, the Nuthatch replied to his friend,
It's my back claw, and pointed front
toes,
It seems to be natural for me to up
end,
When ever in need of repose.

PLACED HIS BET AND LOST

Waiter Took a Chance, but Evidently It Did Not Happen to Be His Lucky Day.

An old darkey waiter had served a modest but quite perfect lunch to two elderly and thrifty-looking guests. He had inquired how each dish suited their taste, whether it had been seasoned properly, if it was hot enough or sufficiently chilled. The check was presented at the close of the meal. It was $3.40. One of the guests glanced over it and placed a $5 bill on the tray. The waiter disappeared, all smiles, and returned with the change—a $1 bill and 50-cent piece and a dime. He put the tray at the guest's elbow and waited doubtfully. He watched the dollar bill slowly withdrawn and then, after a painful pause, the 50-cent piece. The tray, with its lonely dime, was shoved toward him. He picked it up, looked at it sadly and gave a long sigh. "Boss," he said, "I gambled and I lost."—Judge.

Monaco Gambling Metropolis.

Monaco, on the French Mediterranean coast, is the smallest independent state in Europe, having an area of only eight square miles, but containing a population of 23,000. The principality, once considerably larger than at present, belonged to the Grimaldi family, but in 1861 Prince Charles III ceded the greater part of it to France. Monaco's hereditary sovereign is a prince, who is assisted in governing by a council of state. The principal city is Monte Carlo, famous for its casino, the two others being Monaco and Condamine.

Two Good Stories.

Frederic Almy of Buffalo, N. Y.:

"One of my favorite stories is that of the Frenchwoman who complained that she had been grossly insulted by an American with whom she was traveling. On inquiry it appeared that they had traveled alone in the same compartment for an hour and that he had not once looked at her."

"If I may give a two, I like also the story of the [illegible] who cried out. "The Lord is with us, and with Her on our side we cannot fail."—New York Herald.
